and Britain's common membership of the European Union. Nevertheless, for a long time, the conflict seemed impervious even to these momentous changes. Slowly, however, new possibilities opened up. The IRA's ally Sinn Féin, under the leadership of Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness, began to see the potential for democratic political organisation. The British government made it clear in 1990 that it had no selfish 'strategic or economic interest' in retaining control of Northern Ireland. Irish governments, largely driven on by the Northern nationalist leader John Hume, stepped up their engagement in the search for a settlement. United States president Bill Clinton took a benign and active interest in the problem.

The tortuous peace process that led to IRA ceasefires in 1994 and 1996 and culminated in the historic Belfast Agreement of 1998, was bedevilled by the issue of IRA arms. Both governments insisted that the IRA should surrender its arsenal. When this proved impossible, a new word gained currency—decommissioning, the putting of weapons 'beyond use'. In September 2005 the IRA finally decommissioned its weapons, laying the ground for a deal that had seemed utterly impossible—the sharing of power between Sinn Féin and the previously hardline Democratic Unionist Party. Most observers accepted that the decommissioning of mutually hostile mindsets would take a great deal longer, but, for once at least, courage, ingenuity and a refusal to accept the apparently inevitable seemed to be on the winning side of Irish history.

THE MAN-EATERS OF TSAVO

THE MAN-EATERS OF TSAVO

Between 1895 and 1897, a pair of white lions in the Tsavo region of East Africa killed and ate the heads of 28 British soldiers. The incident became a major news story and inspired the 1957 movie "The Man-Eaters of Tsavo".

The lions were eventually killed by a British hunter, and their heads were preserved as trophies. The skulls are now on display in the museum.

1895: The discovery

The first of the two white lions was discovered by a British hunter in the Tsavo region of East Africa in 1895. The lion was killed and its head was preserved as a trophy.
